

As I know it, the federal government makes the minimum standards that states have to follow, and then states can make stricter rules if they so desire. That is why some states have stricter clean air laws and therefore cleaner air than others. I think it is very unproductive for a federal comission to overturn a state's regulation, especially if it is stricter than the federal minimum and desired by so many people. The government is supposed to listen to its people, not companies. Do not overturn New Jersey's Do Not Call law, and protect the people, not the companies.
